The Sandman's Stories

THE LEOPARD'S COUSIN.

NCE upon a time the Queen of the Elves decided to pay a visit to the King of the Gnomes, who was a great friend. The Queen lived in a bower of roses, carpeted with violets, while illies made a sweet breeze over her couch. The Gnome's castle was of heavy stone, and he spent his time in hunting and was rough in his ways. But he had a kind heart, and the Queen thought she would enjoy the change. She was tired of just reigning all day and putting on her jeweled crown every morning. So she told her head groom to make ready the charlot of state at once. In a few moments it stood at the door. The charlot was of glistening mother-of-pearl inhaid with rubles, the wheels of gold and the harness of white satin sewn with pearls, it was drawn by two beautiful, sleek lexpards, who were as gentle and playful as kittens. One of the animals was named Fuz and the other Buz, and you could never tell them apart, were it not that Buz was a discontented fellow who was always peeking about and complaining that he was not treated as nicely as the rest of the animals about the Queen's home.

He would kick about his food and his work hours and even about the CDROULTILL HE.

spots on his side, and would say that everybody had a better time than he; but the fact was that he had a discontented disposition that failed to appreciate the really fine time the Queen gave him.

On the second day of the visit the King invited the Queen to drive with him through his zoo and inspect his fine collection of all kinds of animals. She drove in her beautiful charlot and stopped for a short time before the camel's pen.

before; at any rate, I am going to try this.

So he put a leaf in his mouth, and as he chewed it wished that his neck would get long and that he could eat hay; that he would have two horns, instead of one, like the rhinoceros, and that his legs would grow to be ten times as tall as they were.

In a moment he was just as he had wished; but he was a sight. His long neck stretched straight up into the air, and on his tiny forehead were two glubby horns, while his legs reached up till he looked as if he were on stills. Such an ugly, gawky sight had never been seen before among the animals. He was what we now call a giraffe.

The next morning all the animals laughed at him so that he ran away to the jungle, where he lived eating the young trees. He would weep by the hour about his sad fate and tell the wild beasts that he was once a leopard and show them his spotted hide.

But they only made fun of him when he said that and told him he was "only the leopard's cousin." And ever since then the giraffe has been looking for some one to break the enchantment and turn him into a leopard again.
